Our Ph.D. historians have expertise in business and institutional history, environmental history, the history of technology, and urban history. They are adept at conducting detailed documentary research as well as oral history and use these skills to create a history that is rich in detail.

Our research and writing put your organization's story in full historical context, underscoring how it was affected by, and in turn influenced, larger currents of American history. We will show how past experiences have shaped your company and are relevant to today's challenges.

TELL YOUR HISTORY

Why is the history of your company so important? To make sound decisions today, you need to know where you have been.

Corporate histories enable shareholders and managers to understand the value of your organization's past, enhancing their ability to address issues, evaluate and develop policy, formulate strategic plans, and direct change.

Oral history is an ideal way to begin recording your company's past. Founders, past and present staff, and people affected by your organization's activities possess valuable knowledge that adds life to the story of your organization and can't be found in institutional records.

A well-done corporate history preserves the story of your organization and serves as a record of institutional memory and heritage. It helps communicate your company's unique accomplishments, character, and vision to employees, shareholders, customers, benefactors, the news media, and the general public.
